

The News

An old man told me this and now I, as an old man, tell you. You can't stop listening or pretend you didn't hear. It's too late to turn back time or deny the revelation. Responsibility rests squarely on your shoulders. Step up to it. Embrace it. For the news you are about to hear is the secret wish of all human hearts, a full unfolding acceptance that everything—admitting no exceptions—is worthy of, and waiting for, your love, that you enter through the wide doors of the first thing you really love in this world and pass quickly to the next, bringing each prior thing with you, until nothing is left out. This is the news you now hear, but no longer need to, because once heard, its truth is self-evident and you easily admit you have known it all along. The old man told me, and this old man tells you, "It's the ones who don't know yet that need the love most."
